The USA PATRIOT Act, also known as the Patriot Act, was a law enforcement expired in March 2020. It was developed after the 9/11 attack in New York City. The main purpose of this law is to have full access to track individuals who are suspected to be terrorists. After the September 11 attack on October 26, 2001, President George W. Bush signed this law for national security. This PATRIOT Act has the main purpose of accessing unlimited data of civilians for intelligence agencies to protect national security after dying thousands of lives in terrorism.

Before the president signed the law, there was a conference for the Senate to vote on October 25, 2001. But, the law was put into act and signed by the president with a significant difference in voting. The act was planned to expire by the end of 2005, after putting it into action for a four-year period but it was extended in March 2006 by the president. Later, President Barack Obama signed the extension of the PATRIOT Act on May 11, 2012.

The act has access to search individuals' houses without their permission which allows the Federal Bureau of Investigation to investigate individuals who are suspected to be terrorists. The act also allows to monitoring of phone calls and other wireless network connections without the knowledge of the owners or the individuals. This act not only gives access to these but it enhances border security by spending 50 million dollars to secure the northern security. Later, they developed a newer security technology system to protect the border security services.

The act has broken several human rights from the aspect of privacy. This tracking has access to each individual's personal life. Not only does the act have access to the information listed above, but it also shares those information with law enforcement and intelligence agencies. They even have the right to track financial transactions which they claim for national security. Even though the PATRIOT Act has been accessing tons of data of individuals without letting them know, the public still thinks it was a necessary action since the 9/11 terrorist attack had killed thousands of lives.

After being active for almost two decades, the PATRIOT Act is not active anymore after its extension in 2015. The attempt to extend the act was rejected by the House of Representatives. The law took place an important in uniting law enforcement and intelligence agencies which helped build national security stronger somehow.
